Log Cabin Shop's Early American Trades Fair

Log Cabin Shop hosted its 17th annual Early American Trades Fair Oct. 10-11 at the store in Lodi, Ohio. A wide variety of craftspeople and vendors spread out on the grounds selling their wares and visiting with a large crowd.

A few of them were (top left) Greg Park, who was inletting an entry thimble for a muzzleloader; (bottom left) a blacksmith from Penfield Forge; and Jon Stepleton of Weeping Heart Quill and Bead.

Halloween in 1800s in America, Great Britain

Halloween party of the 1800s. Author's collection.

Editor's note: This history of Halloween was found on a 2013 blog called geriwalton.com - Unique histories from the 18th and 19th centuries.

By Geri Walton | October 31, 2013 |

The name "Halloween" evolved over time. It was shortened from All Hallows' Even and All Hallows Day — the evening of All Hallows' Day and another name for All Saints' Day, respectively. Eventually, it was contracted to "Halloween" and just as the name Halloween evolved, the holiday evolved too throughout Great Britain and the United States.

Halloween was initially influenced by Celtic-speaking countries with traditions such as Samhain, the ancient Celtic New Year celebrated near the end of October. Another influence was All Hallows' Eve. It was a day commemorated in May by Catholics for saints. Despite uneasiness by the church, the day became associated with supernatural ideas, particularly after repeated outbreaks of the bubonic plague occurred. All Souls' Day also influenced Halloween. It was celebrated to honor the dead, and, similar to All Hallows' Eve, there was increased interest in death and the supernatural.

With supernatural leanings, customs related to Halloween also evolved. For instance, All Souls' Day was celebrated by sharing small round cakes, known as "soul cakes." These cakes were distributed door-to-door and given to soulers — primarily children and the poor. Each cake was considered to be a soul and each cake bought a soul respite from purgatory's flames. This practice of giving and receiving is supposedly the origin for trick-or-treating. Costumes associated with Halloween may have started in France during the fourteenth and fifteenth century ...
